When working with the BaseValueInstance type, I have been simply setting variables to the base value instance of each situation. However, I am trying to find a way to cast a value to a value from another type. For example, I have a module which returns a number. Using my base value instance, I convert this into a decimal. If I try to cast the decimal value to a number, the following error occurs: InvalidCastException: Unable to cast object of type 'System.Decimal' to type 'System.IConvertible'. Is there any way to tell F# that a value has a type of System.Decimal, even if it is from another module? A: There is no way to cast one type of BaseValueInstance to another. If you want to do that, you need to convert the value from the other type into one of your BaseValueInstance types. So for example, if you want to convert a Decimal into a BaseValueInstance of type int, you do this: let d = 1.0m let d2 = System.Convert.ChangeType(d, typeof<int>) let bvi = d2 :> BaseValueInstance Beware: F# doesn't support implicit conversions between distinct types. This will cause you all sorts of trouble if you use it for the wrong kind of data. Bitcoin's price chart has developed in a polarizing manner over the past few months. The amount of volume that is traded has been indicative of the price movements we have seen over the past three months. The most notable of these movements was the price increase from around $250 to $350. There have been two notable periods of price movement which have been based on both market sentiment and trading volume. Each of these periods has proven significant, as the market◆

Ask HN: Upright Hacking - stun Do you have a solution of how to detect an upright hacker? ===== stun I believe that most of the world will soon switch from computer screens to tablets to use "internet" and as a consequence loss of privacy. Is there a way to detect the movements of the user and block the evil user? ---- stun I believe in years to come most of the world will switch from computers to tablets (without any question). Still, it's a good point to consider. ---- stun At the moment I am using a mini-tablet to browse HN and publish on Twitter. I love the convenience of this device and I tend to use it every time I enter/exit the train. It is a great way to research the trend (I ----- davismwfl Not sure what you are trying to achieve but if you are trying to determine if someone is looking at your computer in a way they should not, and/or trying to catch someone on screen, then a mouse tracking product like Inrix [1] would help you accomplish that. But that is a targeted product for specific applications. Personally I wouldn't worry about it, and if I did have to worry about it I would probably be doing it wrong.
