Morphological, biological and biochemical characterisation of an aquatic feather diving mussel Heterodonta ziczac (Baltic Sea). It has been shown that, despite the absence of a shell, the mussel Heterodonta ziczac (L., 1758) can perform underwater feathers diving. This behaviour can be observed both under laboratory conditions and in the wild. This study investigated the mussels' morphology, phenology and biochemical response to food. Analyses were performed on populations living in the Finnish Åland Archipelago and in northern Estonia, along with adults from the wild from the River Võrumaa and the Baltic Sea. The first study included 12 H. ziczac from the River Võrumaa and water samples from five H. ziczac populations from the Baltic Sea. During this study, adult mussels reached sexual maturity at about four years. During this study, adult mussels reached sexual maturity at about four years. They showed a heteromorphic mouth-part morphology, as observed in other Heterodonta ziczac. Shells were found in both sexes at the end of June and the beginning of July in all H. ziczac populations. The Åland populations showed the highest rates of shell production and in general, H. ziczac did not use their shells for buoyancy compensation. H. ziczac were found to prefer habitats with sandy bottoms. An endosymbiotic algae, Synechococcus, was also found in the hypobranchial gland as is the case in other mussels. There were no differences in the concentrations of the protein C (alkaline phosphatase), enzyme II of cytochrome oxidase, and glutathione S-transferase (GST) in the gills among the different populations. The studies underlined the relatively uniformity of H. ziczac within and among freshwater and coastal populations and provided biochemical information that will help in their management in Finland and Estonia.
