Video Gallery Sheet metal is often used to clad high-rise buildings, reinforcing concrete with a skin of steel to prevent the building from crushing under its own weight. A new study, however, has found that skyscrapers clad in glass could still become crushing targets — and perhaps even collapse. The paper, published last week in the Journal of Engineering Mechanics, was the first to apply the nonlinear

Homepage: Download TabPlayer Now! It is of great importance in the field of underwater acoustics that the underwater noise be detected at the source of the sound. A typical underwater acoustical detector uses a transducer, such as a hydrophone, to convert the pressure waves into electrical signals. Typically, the transducer is mounted within a housing and the housing is submerged in the water. In order to measure the true underwater noise level, it is necessary to measure the sound at a given source location and then extrapolate the signal from that source to determine the noise level at other locations. A typical method of extrapolation involves determining the backscatter from the transducer. This may be done by utilizing a shield, mounted on a portion of the housing above the transducer, which serves as a "reflector" for the sound waves from the source. The signal produced at the shield is then measured and used to calculate the noise level at a desired location. The shield serves several functions in the process. First, it serves
