This seems like an incomplete solution. The more tables you have, the more undo needed. For a one-table table, there is no need to have an undo table. When a transaction fails, you roll back, not update, the last committed row. What is the benefit of having a "UNDO" table? A: When updating a row, the database needs to update all the rows affected by the update. If you roll back the update, then it's possible you're also causing the update of other rows, depending on the exact code path of the rollback. For example, if you have a set of data that when changed the new data has an AUTO_INCREMENT value of 2, then the table is not recoverable if you roll back the row, because now the next inserted value will be 3. The undo tables allows the database to see only the transactions that happened. After rollback, the new value of the auto_increment field will be 1. In addition, there are cases when a transaction rolls back all changes made by the transaction, so undo tables are needed. For example, imagine that a user has a list of items he wants to sell. Let's say that he will sell the items at 10 cents each and immediately after the sale will exchange the money for 10 cents bills. This sounds like a bad deal, and the user probably doesn't even want to make this transaction, so lets assume that he checks the table of items, and finds that he can make the transaction if he sells item B, item C, item D, and the transaction happens. Let's say the user can't find item B, so he finds item D, and sells that one. He rolls back the transaction for reasons unknown, but the changes
