Extension of experimentally observable dissipation within nonequilibrium steady states: modelling the effects of finite-size and finite-time sampling. We show how the notion of dissipative invariants can be applied to nonequilibrium steady states at finite sample size and finite observation time. The nonlinearity of the observables appearing in the associated invariant relations provides us with an operational measure of the degree of dissipation within the system. The results are illustrated by the time-dependent heat flow between two thermal reservoirs for nonequilibrium steady states of a driven Brownian particle as well as for a driven Kerr optical resonator.
