Baroness (Lord) Ashton of Hyde came to the House of Lords with the intention of "giving the government a chance to finally publish their manifesto on Brexit" - and to announce that "if necessary we will pass a law" to make it happen. An hour into debate, Baroness Ashton told the House of Lords that Labour would "refuse to enter into any Brexit deal unless the government publishes its Withdrawal Agreement with the EU." Then, reflecting the hard-fought debate that we've seen the past few days - and all over the country - the first MP to make their point was Leo Docherty, Conservative. Writing to colleagues, he said: "The Labour party are siding with the hard right and will not implement the result of the referendum. "They have failed in their duty to parliament and the people who voted to leave. "They
