Authors examined the fatty acid profile of fatty tissues of pigs after slaughter and following retorting (in laboratory and in industrial conditions). They found that the main differences in the fatty acid profile between fat samples was caused by the different conditions applied to the pork in the course of processing (in laboratory and industrial conditions). After retorting, the palmitic acid content increased to 50-60% and linoleic acid content decreased to 50-70%. However, in the case of the industrial retorting, both saturated and unsaturated fatty acids increased (from 24% to 29-35%).
